THE IMAGE PROJECT

The trigger for this partnership was mainly born from the increasing awareness that our look at cities' reputations (and at the reputations of areas within cities) could use more diverse enlargement and lighting. Without denying the relevance of by now referential iconic places, there is a need to go beyond the already established and towards a new positioning for cities that captures a broader and more substantiated city map: a map that contributes to seeing beyond the 'obvious', towards the less known.

The matter is urgent. Despite city campaigns, which insist on spreading residents and visitors through our cities, cities tend to concentrate attention, and investments in areas that are already considered referential. But the crux is then, why not extend our view on how reputation and attention is built, and really contribute to a more informed city mapping including a larger diversity of areas and centres of interest? Or as some creative entrepreneurs have put it: Instead of everybody aiming to be in a place that is already successful, wouldn't it be better to find new ways of making more places successful? After all, it is in the so-called 'peripheral' areas that many of our institutions have found a place to build venues and campuses. There are many reasons for these developments, however, it is important to remember the explicit desire of our institutions to contribute to a more varied and prosperous city. Being students, faculty and partners in cities means being agents in these processes as well.
